We offer undergraduate degree programmes in a variety of subjects, ranging from sport to communications, business to drama and from politics to teaching. A degree at St Mary's, however, is about much more than the course you study; our community approach looks to support you on a personal level.

We also offer undergraduate degrees with a foundation year, which provides an alternative route to undergraduate study at university if you do not have the grades to access higher education in the traditional way.

About Theology and Religious Studies at St Mary's

Our degree in Theology, Religion, and Ethics combines contemporary debates with ancient disciplines.

Along with our experts, you will read seminal writers and thinkers of centuries-old traditions, pick up critical views of contemporary world issues, and examine the cultural appropriation of religious ideas and imagery.

You may wish to study modules about science and religious ethics, politics and the Bible, or look closely at developments in theory and theological doctrine.

This degree allows you explore some of the most recent and the most long-standing examples of the perennial human search for meaning and apply them to the realities of contemporary society.

Why St Mary's?

Studying Theology, Religion, and Ethics with us enables you to engage in open critical inquiry and contemporary intellectual debates in a setting with a vibrant religious identity.

We focus on cultivating academic excellence and are deeply concerned with ensuring you receive the best student experience.

The programme includes opportunities to visit religious communities, and we also make use of the galleries and museums of London, situating your degree within the wider cultural economy of the UK.

While the degree takes special account of the University's Catholic identity and ethos, we welcome students from all faith traditions—and none.

Our staff includes academics of various backgrounds and convictions, and we offer a supportive and welcoming community in which you can study. All our staff aim to ensure that you are highly attractive to employers after you graduate.
